Modern Media Film can be used to teach, inform, and entertain, and also as a form of social commentary and political agitation, depending on the specific art form. The most general use of film is as a storytelling medium, where an audience is given an opportunity to experience fiction as a first-hand event. The majority of the money for films is made from ticket sales, so films have become one of the main ways that people spend their time. Film was the most popular cultural form until television began to grow in popularity starting in the early 1920s. Since the 1920s, however, both television and film have continued to grow in popularity, and the popularity of the two media can shift back and forth, especially in regards to commercial success. Television is becoming an increasingly more popular form of film, as television became popular in the 1920s and 1930s, and television continued to grow in popularity. With the growing popularity of television, films also began to grow, as television became more popular as well. In the mid-1970s, television was the most popular film form. Since the 1980s, television's popularity has been growing at a greater rate than that of cinema. Today, films are released on a greater number of screens than television. Television and film have both evolved to be increasingly more digital. It was mentioned earlier that film was one of the most popular forms of cultural expression. Film is still a popular form of media, but it has been the target of criticism over the past few decades for several reasons. The majority of films are created with audiences in mind, so they are designed to entertain, but the specific nature of film tends to put the audience in the role of the observer, as opposed to that of the active participant. For the past several decades, criticism of film has centered on the way in which it is used to convey certain messages about the world, society, or individuals. This is because of the way that film is structured, specifically the fact that it can offer visual cues to the audience that are typically ignored in other forms of
