The correct selection of an anesthetic agent for a specific surgical procedure is a vital component to the anesthesiologist's successful delivery of anesthesia. The ideal anesthetic agent has a rapid onset and offset of action, good stability in solution, is inexpensive and has minimal side effects. Unfortunately, some anesthetic agents are not ideal for all types of surgical procedures. For example, ketamine provides excellent analgesia, but unfortunately produces a paradoxical elevation of blood pressure and reflex tachycardia, which can be life-threatening in certain situations. Thus, there is a need in the field of anesthesiology to create a new and useful method of using ketamine to reduce the effects of blood pressure in response to a surgical stimulus. This invention describes a method of using ketamine in a patient during a surgical procedure, where the ketamine is injected directly into the patient's bloodstream. Ketamine is an enantiomer of phencyclidine (PCP), and has a chemical structure consisting of a cyclohexamine ring covalently attached to a carbon chain through a CH<sub>2</sub> group. Ketamine is chemically related to phencyclidine (PCP) and several other compounds, including norketamine, and is a non-competitive antagonist of the N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) receptor. Ketamine and ketamine derivatives are typically used to produce a short-lasting analgesia for the purpose of pain management during surgical procedures. Ketamine is typically used in the "conscious patient" with the following advantages over other general anesthetics: rapid onset of analgesia; short duration of action; rapid recovery time In addition, ketamine may have less cardiovascular effects than other anesthetic agents, such as isoflurane. Unfortunately, there are also several disadvantages associated with the use of ketamine. The most significant of these disadvantages is the fact that
