Invention The present invention relates to novel ink compositions and more particularly to ink compositions for use with ink-jet printers containing cationic polymer compounds. 2. Brief Description of the Prior Art Ink-jet printers have become a popular means for printing a variety of documents and other printed materials. Such printers employ ink compositions, sometimes referred to as "ink drops" which are emitted under pressure through one or more nozzles to form small ink drops which are deposited on a substrate in a desired pattern. The ink is delivered through the nozzles by various means, such as by a piezoelectric transducer or by heating the ink. Typically, a drive signal generated by a microprocessor is converted into a voltage by a digital to analog converter and applied to the piezoelectric transducer which generates pressure pulses. The pressure pulses force the ink out of the nozzles of the print head. The quality of ink-jet prints has been limited in part by the choice of inks available for use with ink-jet printers. Most inks contain water and dyes, and many inks, especially those with water based solvents and/or water soluble dyes, are formulated to prevent the dye from being removed by contact with paper and/or the ink-receiving medium on which the printed material is deposited. For instance, to prevent ink from being removed by contact with paper, some inks contain hydrophobic materials such as mineral oils or silicone oils. To prevent ink from being removed by contact with the ink-receiving medium, the inks are often treated with various materials such as a clay or a starch to increase the amount of the ink deposited on the medium. However, such treatments can cause other problems such as blurring of the printed images, or coating the paper with the inks. Ink-jet inks can also be formulated to be heat activated, such as by heating the ink by passing the ink over a heated print head. However, many heat-activated inks contain organic 2d92ce491b
