EVERYBODY 2d at 740-41; Reynolds, 837 N.E.2d at 445; Muncie, 726 N.E.2d at 1258. The sentencing statement thus suggests that the trial court did, in fact, consider Shields' mental health as a mitigating factor and decide to impose a sentence shorter than it would have if the trial court had found the fact concerning Shields' mental health to be a significant mitigating factor. See Willis, 873 N.E.2d at 1020 (holding that "the fact that the trial court's statement of reasons for [the defendant's] sentence specifically noted that it had considered ‘his background, medical condition, and his possible need for psychological treatment and/or medication’” supported the conclusion that the trial court had considered the defendant’s mental health as a mitigating factor); Jackson, 547 N.E.2d at 550 (holding that the trial court’s statement that it had considered the defendant’s “medical and psychological history” suggested that it considered the defendant’s mental condition as a mitigating factor). [15] But the trial court’s sentencing statement also suggests that it did not find Shields’

mental health to be a significant mitigating factor. It states that “[t]he Court has considered the information contained in the presentence report,” including Shields’ mental health. Appellant’s App. p. 42. The statement does not refer to Shields’ mental health by name, and does not state that the court considered it as a mitigating factor. Indeed, the statement is not even clear that the trial court 11 considered any of the factors enumerated in Indiana Code Section 35-38-1-7.1(a)(2) as mitigating. The trial court did not elaborate on the
