You are here Meet with Chris Carty 2013-01-25 The Global Energy and Climate Change Partnership and the United Nations Development Programme are collaborating to host a group of senior executives from leading companies to discuss actions to reduce greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions, encourage energy efficiency, and promote carbon markets. The group of companies and senior managers from the private sector will meet with Chris Carty, Executive Director of the Global Energy and Climate Partnership and former Chief of Staff to the Secretary-General, on March 28, 2013 in Wellington, New Zealand. The session will focus on initiatives by governments, the private sector, and civil society to reduce GHG emissions and promote energy efficiency. In addition, the session will discuss how market-based instruments and incentives can be used to reward and reward sustainable behavior. "This is a critical time for sustainability in the global energy and climate change sectors. The partnership is working to increase the number of businesses, governments and civil society organizations joining together to help to achieve global climate change goals. I look forward to meeting with these companies," said Chris

Carty. The session will take place in a casual and open setting. Companies will be encouraged to network and discuss issues of interest and concern. Search The Beachwood Reporter Subscribe to the Newsletter I was a late starter in the "career adult" thing. Like a lot of 20-something-year-old kids, I thought I'd get my fill of adult life between the ages of 21 and 35. But somehow, I've ended up in a situation that most of you have long since left behind: I'm 38. I went to college at a time when the idea of having a "real job" was as inconceivable as a day without butter on your English muffin. So when I graduated in 1998, I found myself jobless and with a few months of unemployment insurance, and $50,000 in debt. Fortunately, I had a boss who did something few bosses have ever done for me. He got me
