A randomized, placebo-controlled trial of a cognitive-behavioural intervention for young women with painful bladder syndrome/interstitial cystitis. To evaluate the efficacy of a cognitive-behavioural intervention for women with symptoms of painful bladder syndrome/interstitial cystitis. Randomized controlled trial. Genitourinary Medicine Clinics in London and the Northwest of England. Women aged 18 to 60, presenting with at least eight months of symptoms of interstitial cystitis or painful bladder syndrome. A total of 170 women with interstitial cystitis or painful bladder syndrome were recruited. The women were randomized to an eight-week course of a cognitive-behavioural intervention, or to a control group, who were offered standard physiotherapy and educational material. The primary outcome measure was a change in pain scores, as measured by a visual analog scale, from baseline to post-intervention. Secondary outcomes included the incidence of urge incontinence, the presence and severity of stress incontinence, changes in quality of life and urinary frequency. The mean duration of symptoms at recruitment was 10 months (standard deviation 7). There were no significant differences in the change in mean pain scores from baseline to follow-up in the cognitive-behavioural intervention group compared with the control group ($P = 0.95$). The treatment effect was smaller when the analysis was restricted to the original treatment group ($P = 0.20$) and also when the analysis was restricted to women who were symptomatic for at least four years at baseline ($P = 0.28$). The incidence of urge incontinence at the follow-up visit was
