Started in August 2002, the group is believed to be the nation-state hackers and is considered one of the top cyber criminals in Russia. Their attack method is to exploit vulnerabilities in softwares and also tries to employ viruses to damage the infrastructure of targeted organizations. The hackers have already confessed to the government of Russia to being a state-sponsored hacking group. About Omerta: Groups like the Omerta are typically groups that deal in "high-value targets", meaning a small number of high-value victims, and are probably dealing with law enforcement. They do not have the same access to smaller organizations and many large organizations in Russia are unlikely to employ a hacker group like this, due to the cost of ownership and the difficulty of employing the right people to conduct cyberattacks on other organizations. In the past, groups like the Omerta have been involved in attacking targets like financial institutions, energy companies, and the Moscow metro. The group has demonstrated not only a wide variety of skills in penetration testing, but also the ability to change their attack methods as they go along, constantly adapting to new information they obtain. Infamous In 1996, the hackers released a "SuperPIPE" virus, with the intent of disrupting Russian banks. At that time, the commercial banking industry was the largest consumer of IT services in the Russian market. The software was written as a virus that would spoof the Windows virus checker, and then launch a worm,
