Convert from WAV to MP3 files or vice versa by simply dragging them onto VR WaveMP3 main window. The output file may be dropped into another application such as Windows Media Player or iTunes. The conversion is even faster than real-time, thanks to multi-threading, and the provided batch conversion does the same without having to enter data by hand. The application can convert hundreds of files in a single operation, creating new directories on the fly, without any user intervention. Easy interface with no need to modify registry entries Audio converters come with various installation processes and often cause issues, so the uninstaller is automatically created. Changes in the source file are not reflected in the operation window, so you need to drop the target file first and then click the button. Performance: Navigation is intuitive, no matter whether you use a touchscreen or a mouse and keyboard. Conversion takes place in a few seconds and you don't have to look for the output file. Conclusions: Although there are other applications available that provide an excellent user experience, they don't provide the simple and highly intuitive way of operating VR WaveMP3. Molecular and functional characteristics of the collagen gene in normal, perimembranous and subendocardial fibroblasts in the human right atrium. The right atrium (RA) is a major site of fibrosis in dilated cardiomyopathy, but there is a lack of knowledge about the collagen gene in normal RA, as well as the difference between perimembranous and subendocardial fibroblasts. This study evaluated the expression of the collagen gene in normal RA, perimembranous, and subendocardial fibroblasts in the human RA. All five collagen types and glycosaminoglycan (GAG) chains were analysed in three fibroblast subtypes by real-time PCR. Cellular proliferation, GAG expression and release, alpha-SMA expression, nuclear translocation of beta-catenin, and the phosphorylation of the beta-catenin/TCF complex were also examined. Of the five collagen types, collagen I, III, and V were predominantly expressed, but not collagen II, in normal, perimembranous, and subendocardial fibroblasts. Similarly, of the four GAG chains analysed, only chondroitin sulfate was predominantly expressed. In normal RA, perimembranous, and subendocardial fibroblasts, alpha-SMA expression was associated with cellular proliferation, GAG expression and release, and nuclear translocation of beta-catenin. These fibroblasts also had higher expression of collagen types I, III, and V, and chondroitin sulfate. In contrast, these fibroblasts had lower expression of collagen II and IV and GAGs, but they showed no nuclear translocation of beta-catenin. These results suggest that there are differences in collagen synthesis between perimembranous and subendocardial fibroblasts, which may contribute to the differential expansion of fibroblasts and myocardium. 1.
