Meiotic drive theory posits that a gamete carrying a deleterious recessive allele can be transmitted at a higher rate than the equilibrium expected from Mendelian segregation of independent alleles. The primary consequence of meiotic drive is that deleterious recessive alleles will often suffer inbreeding depression. If alleles are also linked to deleterious recessive alleles, then inbreeding depression should be particularly severe. These predictions are borne out by empirical studies, but their predictive power hinges on the assumption that the number of deleterious alleles is very small, or on populations being free of inbreeding depression. When deleterious alleles are not linked to deleterious alleles, and also show substantial inbreeding depression, deleterious allele effect is predicted to be strong even if the number of deleterious alleles is large. We use the harmonic mean estimator of inbreeding depression to model deleterious allele effect and test
