'Genuinely love' Amazon's Alexa, for now Unofficial third-party devices capable of controlling Amazon's Alexa virtual assistant will not be banned. The Ministry of Defence has not banned them, however, the general guideline which states that the use of such devices for the purpose of communicating with "the Ministry of Defence of the United Kingdom” is a serious offence is still in place. According to BBC News, Amazon said in a tweet that it was “genuinely happy” to see the Ministry of Defence’s position. “We believe that the the Ministry of Defence (MoD) views the use of technology that facilitates voice interaction with customers, including Alexa, as acceptable. Genuinely happy to see that their position on this point of policy has not changed, and we look forward to continuing to enable their customers to interact with their Alexa service in the UK,” the statement read. The MoD claimed that the use of such devices for the purposes of communicating with people working in the MoD is a serious offence. People are guilty of such an offence if they fail to “ob
