(Photo via EA Sports) Here's what I think it means, and why I think it's important: I love the (ridiculous) name for FIFA 22's feature on the FIFA website that was chosen by EA to introduce the feature is "HyperMotion Technology." It's a fitting name, in that the most important visual difference between last year and this year's game is that actually you will see more motion in it. The year-to-year improvement to the game's animation isn't visible to the naked eye, but is rather one of many hidden aspects of the game. The best way to explain this is by first explaining what HyperMotion is. HyperMotion was introduced in FIFA 13 as a way for EA to incorporate real-life data from player movements and physical trials into player animations. That data, which was collected in the motion capture suits the athletes wore during last year's official trials in London, was used to create player movements in various cutscenes and throughout the course of a FIFA match. In FIFA 13 it was hard to see the difference between the motion in the game and the motion of real-life players. In FIFA 14, however, EA took the time to make it much more obvious—player models that appeared in cutscenes and gameplay moved more naturally than before, giving players of previous titles a chance to feel more connected to the game. The result was one of the best-looking video games of all time, but a new kind of connection, too. In FIFA 16, while most of the motion in the game was fairly similar to that of real-life athletes, the movements in the game also seemed to be the result of people playing the sport on the field. For example, the general movements of players would reflect their style of play and the way they move through the midfield—it felt as if the people playing FIFA on the field were having a conversation with the people playing FIFA at home. (There was, however, some motion that was added to each player model that was simply part of making the animation more realistic, such as the fact that athletes' feet tend to drag when they're not moving.) So what's different in FIFA 22, exactly? Well, in order to use the information that was collected from the

FIFA is the official videogame of the FIFA franchise. FIFA 20 is the latest instalment of the very successful franchise. Inside this guide we are going to answer the question how to play football. A football player is put in control of a small team of players. The players run around the pitch, kick the ball, pass, dribble, control the use of space, and sometimes perform acrobatic tricks. Most soccer games have a set number of gameplay or football modes, in which the player controls a team of 10 players in a match on a fixed pitch. The player is required to guide his team to victory by scoring more goals than the opposition. Succeeding in a football match depends on a variety of skills, including passing, tackling, skillful dribbling and shooting. FIFA 17 introduced the FUT Champions mode, which in comparison to FIFA's traditional gameplay is more complex and requires manual involvement. In
