It is common practice in the waste water industry to separate a mixture of solids, liquids and gases and recover at least a portion of the solids for further processing and/or disposal. One such system is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 4,865,752 to Barnes, which discloses the partitioning of fluid into two or more phases. Fluid is caused to flow through a tubular member into and out of a chamber. The chamber contains an impervious partition for dividing the chamber into primary and secondary chambers with a first phase, liquid, flowing into the primary chamber and a second phase, gas, flowing out of the primary chamber. The partition is composed of a plurality of interconnected layers, each having a plurality of openings for fluid communication. The layers are interconnected in a stacked array with the openings in adjacent layers aligned with each other to form a continuous fluid pathway. A pressure differential is established across the tubular member from one chamber to the other so that the partition essentially prevents the flow of liquid from the primary chamber to the secondary chamber but allows flow of the gas to the secondary chamber. U.S. Pat. No. 3,362,865 to Allendorf discloses a particle separation apparatus for the separation of solids and liquids. The fluid is passed through the outer diameter of a cylindrical housing and is forced by the gravity of the container through inner diameter of the housing. A conical partition is arranged at the bottom of the container to serve as a filter. The inlet is inclined to the axis of the housing at an angle of 30 degrees to 55 degrees and the outlet is perpendicular to the inlet. U.S. Pat. No. 3,557,738 to Ogden discloses a gas/liquid separator. The separator is a cylindrical container with a central partition of which the upper ends constitute the inlet and lower ends constitute the outlet. The central partition has an upturned edge in the lower region so that the lower edge of the partition is sloped downwardly. Gas is introduced into the lower end and gradually rises through the gas receiving chamber. U.S. Pat. No. 3,866,249 to Bannister discloses a method of separating solids, liquids and gases. The fluids are first separated into solid and liquid phases by passing the fluids through three cylindrical chambers 595f342e71
