Objective: To investigate the early and mid-term clinical outcomes in patients with renal insufficiency undergoing percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) with drug-eluting stents (DES) during acute coronary syndrome (ACS). Methods: From January 2013 to May 2015, the clinical data of 42 patients with renal insufficiency undergoing PCI with DES for ACS were collected, including 17 patients with chronic renal insufficiency (CRI), 9 patients with end-stage renal insufficiency (ESRI) undergoing hemodialysis, and 16 patients with acute renal insufficiency (ARI) undergoing peritoneal dialysis. The outcomes of PCI for ACS and the early and mid-term effects of DES were observed in the three groups. Results: Compared with the ARI group, the preprocedural variables in CRI and ESRI groups had no significant difference (all $P > 0.05$). The occurrence rates of angina and the percentage of GRACE risk score ≥ 150 were significantly higher in the ARI group, while the rate of small vessel lesions was lower than that in CRI and ESRI groups (all $P < 0.05$). Among the treatment options for gastric and esophageal cancers, only surgery provides potential cure. Unfortunately, the majority of patients present with late-stage disease, at which time no surgical options are available. In general, patients with cancer experience a decline in health-related quality of life (HRQOL) beginning with the discovery of an incurable disease. Addressing the treatment needs of late-stage cancer patients requires the development of effective palliative treatments, most
